II. RELATED WORK

The study and development of resting mattresses have evolved significantly over the years. Initially, traditional mattresses were constructed using simple materials like cotton, wool, and innerspring coils, offering basic comfort and support. As sleep science advanced, memory foam mattresses were introduced, providing better pressure relief and contouring to body shape, which gained wide consumer acceptance. Latex mattresses also emerged as a durable and hypoallergenic option, giving users a more natural alternative.

Researchers have continually explored ways to enhance mattress functionality. Gel-infused foams were developed to address issues with heat retention in memory foam, improving temperature regulation during sleep. Hybrid mattresses soon followed, combining the benefits of innerspring systems with foam or latex for optimal support and comfort. Studies have demonstrated that medium-firm mattresses often provide superior spinal alignment and sleep quality, especially for people with chronic back pain.

Innovations in orthopedic and pressure-relief mattresses have been instrumental for individuals with musculoskeletal issues. Pressure mapping technologies are now used to scientifically evaluate how well a mattress supports different parts of the body. Zoned support systems, which apply varying firmness levels to specific body regions, have become popular in premium mattresses. Furthermore, smart mattress technology has entered the market, featuring embedded sensors that monitor sleep cycles, body movements, and even heart rate.

V. RESULTS AND DISCUSSION

The results of the study indicated that medium-firm mattresses provided the best overall support and comfort, especially in maintaining spinal alignment during sleep. Pressure mapping data showed reduced stress points on the hips and shoulders, particularly with memory foam and hybrid mattresses. Participants reported improved sleep quality, reduced back pain, and fewer sleep disturbances. Smart mattresses with adaptive firmness and sleep tracking features also received high satisfaction scores. Temperature regulation was more effective in gel-infused and breathable foam models. Durability tests confirmed that latex and hybrid designs maintained shape and support over time. While soft mattresses offered initial comfort, they often lacked sufficient long-term support. The discussion highlights that personalization based on body type and sleeping position significantly influences mattress performance. Results also support the integration of ergonomic design and smart technologies in future developments. Overall, the study reinforces the importance of scientific testing in enhancing mattress functionality and user well-being.
